

Senior Scoop

Teaching Children About Money Now, Pays Dividends Later

Set them on a path toward a solid financial future

Managing money isn't easy. Waiting to learn about handling money until you are on your own as an adult makes it even more challenging. Teaching kids about money early on will help them to become more financially independent as they get older. Financial education has been linked to lower debt levels, higher savings, and higher credit scores as children mature into adulthood. Later on in life, that financial education is also positively connected to net worth and investing.

Parents are the primary influence on a child's future financial well-being because they have many occasions to communicate information, set powerful examples, and involve children in activities that teach them financial skills. Parental involvement in their children's financial education has long lasting effects.

Different ways children learn about money

- One of the biggest ways children learn is by observing. Chances are, one or both parents go to work to provide for their family. Children can see that a relationship exists between work and money. Having a conversation with children about work and how earnings influence purchases, where you live, and how you get to work.
- Another great way to teach children about money is by including them when paying bills or discussing large purchases. Family financial meetings can be a way of teaching children about the financial choices you make and why you make them. Depending on the age of the children, try to put it in terms they understand. The main idea is to teach them the importance of budgets and making choices with your money.
- Children learn about money by doing. By having children actively participate in a trip to the grocery store, they can see how budgeting relates to shopping. You might open a savings account online to provide an opportunity to teach about saving money, especially if they see you are saving as well. At an appropriate time, an outing to your local bank to show them where their account is located and what a bank does can also prompt conversations about money. If your child operates a lemonade stand, has a cookie sale, dog sits, or babysits, use these occasions to teach about earning, spending, saving, and donating.
- Children can learn about money by reading with you. A number of children's books currently on the market teach all about earning, spending, saving, borrowing, and donating. These books provide an easy and spontaneous opportunity for questions and answers. Check your local library for suggestions; you may be able to check out books online with your library card. You may also be able to read books online through other free services.
- Children learn about money by playing, particularly if you are playing with them. Board games with play money can be great teachers. Online games provide a fun way to teach about money and start smart money conversations.

Source: FDIC Consumer News

#AlwaysLIVE

All day support - 24 hours a day, 7 days a week!
Call 920.485.7311 or 888.343.3040

We enjoy working together to make lives better and more secure.